The Bonaparte-Patterson Marriage. Sixty-nine years have gone by since Bishop Carroll read the marriage service and pronounced Jerome Bouaparte and Elizabeth Patterson husband and wife. As all the world knows, the tie which on that December morning was declared by ecclesiastical authorty to be indissoluble was a year later violently sundered. The foolish young man who had taken. to himself a wife without the consent of his powerful brother, was held to be incompetent to enter into such an engagement on account of his not having arrived at the age of twentyfive, and the "First Consul" affected to regard the whole affair as a little intrigue in which Jerome had become involved. The rejected wife returned to her father's house, bringing with her an infant son, who grew to manhood, lived to a good old age and died; but the mother still survives to dream over disappointed hopes.

There is a pathos in the story of this woman's life which will perpetuate it for generations to come, and centuries must elapse before the Bonaparte-Patterson marriage will cease to be a theme for romantic speculation. The latest book laid upon our table is a history of this remarkable union, and a compendium of the secret correspondence between members of the Patterson family and their agents in France in relation thereto. The author, Mr. France in relation thereto. The author, Mr. W. T. R. Saffell, had a rich mine of materials from which to compile his book, and we do not think that it is yet exhausted. The prenot think that it is yet exhausted. The preservation of these documents is almost as singular as the affair of which they treat. Messrs. Hontine & Murdoch, dealers in papermakers' material, bought a lot of old rubbish which had lain neglected for half a century in a warehouse once occupied by Mr. Patterson (Madame Bonaparte's father.) In looking over the musty papers a package of letters was found which proved to be the long-missing cor-respondence. These letters came into the possession of Mr. Saffell, and for the first time are made public in the volume now before us. Madame Bonaparte was consulted as to the propriety of publishing them, and she expressed herself as being entirely indifferent on the subject. Her grandsons, Colonel Jerome N. Bonaparte and Mr. Charles J. Bonaparte, from considerations of delicacy, very naturally opposed the publication, and desired the compiler so to state in the preface to his work.

There is certainly nothing in these letters which does not reflect honor upon the Patterson family, and their publication will correct many wrong impressions concerning this un-happy marriage. Mr. William Patterson had no ambition to marry his daughter to a French naval officer, even though his brother was a prospective Emperor. He opposed the match until he found that nothing but force and viclence would prevent it. After it was consummated, the whole family were anxious that Jerome should give up all his hopes of preferment in France and become a citizen of the U. S. They preferred that the young people should live happily in this country, rather than encounter the storms of revolution, with the re-this correspondence relates to this unsuccessful mission. He writes hopefully at first, for all the members of the Bonaparte family, Napoleon excepted, expressed themselves as well pleased with Jerome's marriage. He had a friend with him, Captain Paul Bentalou, who seems to have been a man of great address, who 'interviewed' Lucien Bonaparte and brought back a most flat-tering report. "Tell Mr. Paterson," said Lu-cieu, "that our mother, myself, and the whole family, with one voice and as heartily as I do, highly approve of the match. The Consul, it is true, does not for the present concur with us but he is to be considered as isolated from his family. Placed on the lofty ground on which he stands as the first magistrate of a great and powerful nation, all his actions and ideas are directed by a policy with which we have nothing to do. We still remain plain citizens; and as such, from all we have learned of the young lady's character, and the respectability of her friends, we are, and feel highly gratified with the connection; that they need not in the least be hurt by the displeasure of the Consul; that myself, although of an age to be my own master, and occupying distinguished places under the Government, I have also, by my late marriage, incurred his displeasure, so that Jerome is not alone. But, as when we do marry, we are to consult our own happiness, and not that of another, it matters not who else is or is not to be displeased."

After reading this correspondence no one will entertain a very exalted opinion of Jerome Bonaparte. More resentment will be felt at his want of true manhood than at the relentless cruelty of his brother. He might have taken the advice of his mother, accepted a handsome aunuity, become a citizen of the United States, and lived and died an honored and happy man. He chose rather to accept the barren honor of a crown which was not his by hereditary right; to desert his young and beautiful wife, and to earn the contempt of all mankind. Before liss l'atterson's marriage her father received an anonymous letter, which he endorsed with the date (November 5, 1803) and filed away. This writer was evidently some Frenchman who was intimately acquainted with Jerome Bonaparte, and the facts in his history thus communicated to his future father-in-law, were not calculated to enhance the old gentleman's peace of mind. Other letters of warning came, but the marriage went on, and his subsequent conduct justified the darkest prophecies of the unknown writers .- Balt. American.
